About Hornet models

Hornet models first appeared in 1986, and they were some of the earliest figurines to appear in the 1:35 scale that is now almost universal. From the start, the series was much praised by the modelling press, and some of the world's best modellers have used the range ever since. The Hornet heads and hands appear regularly on award winning models all over the world.

Modern plastic kits are often very good indeed, but technical limitations mean that faces and hands on injection-moulded figurines lack refinement and individuality. The Hornet range allows a modeller to make a mass-produced figurine into something unique.

A word about scale: We always give the scale as a ratio, and try not to use vague terms such as ‘54mm’. As a guide, what some manufacturers describe as 54mm approximates to 1:32 scale, although this can vary a little. It is simple and easy to check accuracy of modelling - 1mm (or inch) of actual dimension on a 1:35 model should represent 35mm (or inches) on the real thing. Sometimes you will see the ratio expressed as a fraction, (eg 1/35) but it means the same!

Each set of Hornet replacements has five different resin heads, with the exception of some tank crew sets, where fewer heads plus accessories such as microphone booms are provided. Each set is represented here by a picture of just one item. The other heads in the kit are different but of the same quality, with varying facial expressions.

All the heads in this series were sculpted by Roger Saunders alone, ensuring consistency throughout the entire range. ‘Hornet heads’ feature regularly in modelling articles, and they are used by some of the world’s leading miniaturists. (And also, regrettably, on commercial figurines produced by some less scrupulous rivals!)

The scale is 1:35, but because human anatomy varies widely, many of the ‘bald bare’ heads will suit 54mm figurines. Of course, hair can be modelled on to bulk out the skulls with the style of your choice!

The ‘H32’ reference heads are slightly larger and are more likely to be suitable for ‘54mm’ figurines.
